

Machine learning is a subset of artificial intelligence where computer systems are trained to learn patterns in data and make decisions without being explicitly programmed. Instead of writing hard-coded rules, engineers feed algorithms large amounts of data, allowing the system to learn and improve autonomously.